Carbon emissions now exceed pre-1980 levels for the first time, with experts warning that politicians and business leaders must drastically cut emissions in order to avoid catastrophic climate change. Prof Sir Nicholas Stern, who chaired the United Kingdom's influential Climate Change Committee which released its landmark report on Tuesday, said the "single most important" thing that businesses and governments could do to combat climate change would be to agree a global carbon price. "It's not going to be easy, and I'm not recommending it," said Sir Nicholas, who has been advising world leaders on climate change for more than 20 years. "The last thing I'd like to be the person who is responsible for changing the world. "But if we continue at the current rate, within 30 years we will not have the choice of whether to change the world or not. There will no longer be a choice. And then our grandchildren will feel the pain." The Stern Report urged governments to aim to cut carbon emissions in the short term by at least 45 per cent below 1990 levels by 2050, including a 30 per cent reduction in Britain by 2025. It predicted that global demand for energy and the need to replace coal with gas and oil could each grow by about 40 per cent over the next four decades, unless governments step in to impose a price on carbon emissions. "If we continue as we are, we will destroy the planet," said Sir Nicholas, who recently stepped down as chief economist at the World Bank. "We will not solve climate change simply by reducing emissions. The question is where would we then go to reduce emissions if we have already used up our natural resources." The Stern report focused heavily on the impact of climate change on developing countries, predicting widespread crop failure, crop migration and famines as the world's population rises from today's 7 billion to 9 billion by 2050. Sir Nicholas concluded that the world may have only 11 years to keep warming below 2 degrees. "If we don't act soon, we will make catastrophic changes to our societies," he said. "Even if emissions could be
